In rural communities today the economic fulcrum that is widely found is from the livestock sector. The livestock business that is widely cultivated by the community is broiler farming. Recently, the chicken farming business has been accused of being a business that contributes to polluting the environment. The number of chicken farmers in the community is felt to be disturbing to the community, especially chicken farmers whose places are close to residential areas. The negative impact caused is the smell of sewage, scattered dust and flies. This study aims to find out the form of behavior of chicken farmers in the midst of community settlements. As well as knowing the business ethics of the chicken farming business in the midst of community settlements.

This research is a field research (field reseach) using a qualitative research approach, data collection techniques with observation, interviews and documentation. Obsevation is carried out by looking directly at the place of what the environmental conditions of the farm are. Interviews were conducted with the owner of the breeder and the surrounding community while the documentation was carried out as a photo of the evidence of the data taken during the research.

Based on the results of this research, it was concluded that the chicken farm located in the village of Teluk Sari Amuntai Selatan owned by Mr. H. Husain and Mr. Aspuri was in accordance with the principles of Islamic business ethics. .
