Profil “The Jakarta Post” newspaper

The year 1983 marked an important milestone in the history of media publishing in Indonesia when the first issue of The Jakarta Post appeared on April 25.

The new English daily is unique, not only in its goal, which is to improve the standard of English language media in Indonesia, but also in bringing together four competing media publishers into producing a quality newspaper with an Indonesian perspective.

The objective of the new publication was to present to the public a newspaper of the highest quality that would provide its readers with all the news that was not only fit to print, but that would deepen their insight into the very workings of this vast archipelago, its people and its government, as members of the great family of nations.

The history of the newspaper dates back to a conversation in mid-1982, between then minister of information Ali Moertopo and Mr. Jusuf Wanandi, who represented the government-backed Golkar newspaper Suara Karya. Minister Moertopo mentioned the possibility of publishing an English-language newspaper of the highest editorial quality which would not only cater to the fast growing foreign community in the country — the result of more than a decade of opening up the economy to the global community — but more importantly one that would be able to provide an Indonesian perspective to counter the highly unbalanced Western-dominated global traffic of news and views.

To serve the purpose, several requirements had to be met. The paper would have to bring together some of the best Indonesian journalists and editors in order to be able to produce a quality newspaper of international standards. Simultaneously it should also represent the different factions of the broad, sociopolitical spectrum of the nation to be able to nurture a truly Indonesian perspective.

Of no less importance, the company should be managed professionally so that it could grow into an economically strong institution capable of consistently maintaining high-quality journalism. And last but not least, the ownership of the newspaper should also reflect the philosophy of the nation, hence the collectively owned shares of the employees, besides the no-single-majority equity participation of its founders.

Thus the company, PT Bina Media Tenggara, was founded in late 1982 as an independent newspaper institution privately owned by four competing media groups publishing some of the leading national publications: Suara Karya, Kompas, Sinar Harapan and Tempo. Ten percent of equity (later increased to 20 percent) was provided as a collective share of all employees.

Immediately afterward, a team of experienced journalists and editors was selected from the four founding companies, as well as from other news organizations. For the business side, a special team was set up within the Kompas-Gramedia group to help manage the marketing, distribution and other pertinent functions of the news organization based on a yearly management contract.

On the first day of publication, not more than 5,474 copies of the newspaper reached readers. The contents of its eight pages varied from news about Soviet espionage activities in the region, to an article written by Kompas' Jakob Oetama on the installation of H. Harmoko as the new minister of information, just a few months after he was personally involved in the preparatory stage of this newspaper in his capacity as chairman of the Indonesian Journalists Association (PWI), plus a few congratulatory advertisements.

Looking back, it was not a very impressive newspaper. However, a fresh and different outlook was created in the Indonesian press.¹

President Joko "Jokowi" Widodo renewed his pledge on Tuesday to modernize the country's aging weapons systems and military equipment in the wake of the crash of an Air Force C-130 Hercules in Medan, North Sumatra, which killed at least 113 people on board.

Jokowi, who was briefed about the crash during his official visit to Cilacap, Central Java, said his government would launch an audit of the country's defense system, while at the same time pledging that he would step up efforts to modernize weaponry and equipment.

"Since these accidents have occurred frequently, we have to modernize and renew [defense equipment]. We will launch a total audit because accidents have occurred more than once or twice," Jokowi said.

Following the crash, the government has been urged to continue its ongoing efforts to modernize the country's air defense system.

A number of lawmakers in the House of Representatives Commission I, which oversees defense and foreign affairs, renewed their call for the modernization of the country's aging defense systems.

According to the Air Force, the plane, which was built in the US in 1964, had undergone an inspection before taking off on Tuesday.

Commission I chairman Maftuhz Siddiq said the crash once again highlighted the urgent need for the modernization of the country's military equipment. Maftuhz, a politician from the Prosperous Justice Party (PKS) said Commission I was working to get details on the origin of the doomed Hercules.

President Joko "Jokowi" Widodo says the crash of an Air Force C-130 Hercules in Medan, North Sumatra, is a sign that the country must start building and maintaining its own defense industry.

Jokowi said on Wednesday that he had already ordered the Defense Ministry and the Indonesian military (TNI) to reorganize the management and procurement of military equipment.

"We can no longer afford simply to buy military equipment, we must now move to organizing the weapons and military equipment industry, from design and production to operations and maintenance," he said after a commemoration of the National Police's 69th anniversary at the Mobile Brigade (Brimob) headquarters in Depok, West Java. "We must also dispose of all weapons and equipment that are obsolete."

Jokowi argued that the country's military could only be in full control of their weapons and equipment if they were designed and made domestically, instead of relying on foreign equipment, which was some-

Greek Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras signaled he's ready to end his standoff with creditors as the country gets a taste of financial meltdown.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel, Europe's dominant leader, refused to engage until after a July 5 referendum called by Tsipras on budget cuts demanded by creditors, effectively pressuring him to call it off.

It took a third day of capital controls, rationing pensions and the expiry of Greece's bailout for the government in Athens to say it was willing to accept his adversaries' latest offer as a basis for compromise. The looming vote was the major stumbling block, along with disagreements over pensions, spending and taxes.

James "Jim Bob" Moffett, chairman of US mining giant Freeport-McMoran Inc., met with President Joko "Jokowi" Widodo in Jakarta Thursday to seek certainty over the future of the mining company's operations in Indonesia.

The visit followed an announcement made earlier in June that the company had in principle agreed to change its contract of work (CoW) into a license scheme, a move which would enable the mining giant to more quickly secure a contract extension.

The alcohol prohibition bill is one step closer to being passed into law, with political factions at the House of Representatives agreeing in a plenary session on Friday to start its deliberation.

All 10 political party factions gave written approval to the deliberation of the bill during the plenary meeting, giving the House full authority in the drafting of its contents.

Making Jakarta A SMART CITY

Imagine driving in Jakarta without getting trapped in traffic, being able to drift around freely, knowing where to park and hopping on the next train without losing time, energy and patience.

Tertiani ZB Simanjuntak
THE JAKARTA POST/JAKARTA

This utopian vision could become a reality as the Jakarta administration moves quickly to build a smart city by 2018, when the city will host the regional sporting event, the Asian Games. Jakarta, which celebrated its 488th anniversary on June 22, lags behind other big cities in the region in utilizing information and communication technology advancements to address urban challenges. Jakarta is in the first phase of building the "Jakarta Smart City" mobile website slated for release this month — a task handled by the newly set up Jakarta Smart City unit. It will integrate the administration's existing crowd-source website Qlue, traffic info and chat platform Waze and the CROP app, used by officials to respond to public complaints.

The unit's head, Setiaji, said his team also plans to include multi-purpose courier and motorcycle taxi service Go-Jek, the 2015 winner of the Jakarta Urban Challenge competition, as well as the

At the talk show, Jakarta Transportation Agency head Benjamin Bukit and head of the Organization of Land City Transportation Owners (Organda) Shafruhan Simungan said that Uber was not abiding by regulations on tariffs, among other violations, however there were no current regulations that forbade it from operating.

Uber's representative for the region, Joshua Ho, said Uber was in the process of meeting the legal requirements to run a business in Jakarta while emphasizing that as a technology application company it doesn't actually own the cars nor employ any of the drivers. Storekeepers' siestas sign of weak demand

Esther Sambok
THE JAKARTA POST/JAKARTA

It is a regular day in Tanah Abang market, the largest wholesale clothing market in Southeast Asia, thousands of customers squeeze into packed 4-square-meter shops sprawled across multiple buildings, eager to buy their Idul Fitri outfits. But storekeepers are not as excited. Sales have been weaker than in previous years, with storekeepers saying this is the "worst Ramadhan" season in at least the past five years. The fasting month that precedes the Idul Fitri festivities, in the country with the world's largest Muslim population, is normally the time of year when revenues peak.

"I can even take naps because the store is so deserted," said one storekeeper among many at Tanah Abang Blok A when asked about sales.

Govt to redistribute land

THE JAKARTA POST/JAKARTA

To deal with rampant land disputes involving indigenous communities, the government has unveiled a plan to allocate at least 20 percent of current concession areas operated by private companies for management by local people.

The Environment and Forestry Ministry said on Monday that the government had set a target of allocating 8.5 million hectares of forest to local people within the next four years, the majority of which will be taken from around 30 million hectares of concession forest.

The 30 million hectares of for-

Despite the decision to increase the proportion of land allocated for local communities from 5 to 20 percent, the Indigenous Peoples Alliance of the Archipelago (AMAN) said that it still fell short of restoring the rights of indigenous people to manage their customary forests.

New ruling upsets forestry firms

Khoirul Amin

THE JAKARTA POST/JAKARTA

Forestry companies have raised concerns over a new ministerial regulation that requires them to allocate at least 20 percent of their existing concession areas to local people, saying the ruling would severely hurt their plantation operations.

Association of Indonesian Forest Concessionaires (APIH) executive director Purwalli Soepriyanto said the regulation would make their forestry business no longer economically viable because it would significantly squeeze their plantation areas.

"We do understand the government's purpose to provide greater benefits to the people, but we're concerned that the rule could possibly 'retain' companies' efforts to slash business costs," he told The Jakarta Post on Tuesday.

Under the previous regulation, an industrial forest concession holder is required to allocate up to 70 percent of its concession areas for industrial forests, 10 percent for indigenous people, 5 percent for use by local or indigenous communities, 10 percent for forest conservation areas and 5 percent for utility areas.

Under Environment and Forestry Minister Hidayatullah's new ruling, they are mostly involved in timber,

- >> Forestry firms worried new ruling will affect existing plantations
- >> Land allocated for locals increased to 20%
- >> 154 companies involved in industrial forestry business which was issued in March, the percentage of areas dedicated for local people increased to at least 20 percent. While technical details of the regulation are still being formulated, the association is worried that the government would require its members to reduce the size of their existing industrial forest areas to fulfill the 20 percent quota for use by local communities.

Parwadi said that if the regulation was not changed, it could significantly squeeze their existing industrial forestry areas. For this reason, he said, the association had proposed to the government to impose the new regulation only on a new concession area, not the areas that have been planted.

As many as 154 of the association's members are involved in the industrial forestry business, with total concession areas of 745 million hectares. They are mostly involved in timber, sago and rubber plantations. Publicly listed agriculture company PT Sampoerna Agro — part of conglomerate Sampoerna Group — stated that it was still studying the new policy when contacted separately by the Post.

Apart from its palm oil business, Sampoerna Agro currently runs sago and rubber plantations in Riau and South Sumatra, respectively. Meanwhile, publicly listed palm oil and wood producer PT Dharma Satya Nusantara (DSN Group), which holds a forest concession for a timber plantation, said that it would welcome the new regulation despite its business being affected.

According to the company, revenues from its wood production dropped 6.9 percent year-on-year to Rp 344 billion (US$257 million) during the first quarter of the year. "Basically, we will comply with any of the government's regulations," said DSN corporate secretary Pullina Suryant in a text message.

The government has set a target of allocating 5.5 million hectares of forest to local people in the next four years, the majority of which will be taken from around 10 million hectares of existing forest concession areas.

The move is aimed at meeting the government's target to allocate 12.7 million hectares of forest areas for use by local and indigenous people, as stated in the National Mid-Term Development Plan (RPJMN) for 2014 to 2019.

This year alone, the government plans to give 2.5 million hectares of forest to local people, with 20 percent from concession areas.

The Environment and Forestry Ministry argues that the redistribution of forest will prevent conflict and create justice in forest management, which has long been dominated by large companies.

As many as 40.8 million people and 20,000 villages around and inside Indonesian forests do not have access to forest management, according to the ministry's data.

Meanwhile, the Alliance of Indigenous Peoples (AMAN) said that the increase in the allocation of the land area to local people would not restore the rights of indigenous people to manage their customary forests.

AMAN secretary-general Abdan Nababan said the increase was too small given the fact that the size of the customary forests used for plantation activities was estimated to reach 40 million hectares nationwide.

The Environment and Forestry Ministry's secretary general, Bambang Hendroyono, said the new regulation would be able to reduce the size of industrial forests to about 4 million hectares within the next five years.

Under fire for the sluggish realization of his campaign promises, President Joko “Jokowi” Widodo attempted to boost optimism among business players on Thursday, but offered few tangible steps to reverse the country’s economic slowdown.

For businesses, the short-term economic condition would be “bitter” during a period of stabilization, but things would improve in the long run, Jokowi told hundreds of economists, businesspeople and academics during a gathering held by the Indonesian Economists Association (ISEI).

Jokowi said he hoped the economy would reverse course when

KY pair named suspects for defamation

Fedina S. Sundaryani
THE JAKARTA POST/JAKARTA

National Police chief Gen. Badrodin Haiti confirmed on Saturday that Judicial Commission (KY) chairman Suparman Marzuki and commissioner Taufiqurrohmah Syahmi had been named suspects for the defamation of South Jakarta District Court judge Sarpin Rizaldi. Sarpin was the judge who ruled in favor of National Police deputy chief Comr. Gen. Budi Gunawan by ordering the Corruption Eradication Commission (KPK) to drop its probe into the one-time National Police chief candidate. Sarpin filed a police report against Suparman and Taufiqurrohmah in March after the two criticized his controversial decision to invalidate then police chief candidate Comr. Gen. Budi Gunawan's suspect status in a pretrial petition filed in February. He had been named a suspect for corruption by the KPK. According to Badrodin, initial police investigations indicate strong evidence that the two commissioners violated the Criminal Code (KUHP). Meanwhile, National Police detective division chief Comr. Gen. Budi Waseso said that his investigators had more than enough evidence to charge the two KY commissioners. Badi Waseso said that news reports presented by Sarpin's legal team contained enough evidence to name the pair suspects. He added that the pair had been named suspects in their capacity as individuals and that the case had nothing to do with their occupations in the judiciary.

"This has nothing to do with the institution. They are still suspects. Don't try to link the legal process to certain institutions," he said. Police have summoned Suparman and Taufiqurrohmah for questioning on Monday. Shortly after Sarpin made the ruling on Budi Gunawan, the KY recommended that the Supreme Court, which is in charge of judges across the country, issue Sarpin with a six-month suspension for allegedly violating the code of ethics in his handling of the case. The Supreme Court claimed, however, that as of Thursday, it had yet to receive the recommendation on Sarpin from the KY. Furthermore, Supreme Court Chief Justice Hatta Ali said that the Supreme Court Supervisory Committee had investigated Sarpin and found no proof that the latter had abused his power. Separately, Taufiqurrohmah denied that his criticism was an attempt to defame Sarpin, insisting his remarks had been a critique of Sarpin's decisions in court, rather than a personal attack. He also said he would probably skip Monday's interrogation session. "Maybe I will be able to attend after the Idul Fitri holiday," he said. One of Sarpin's lawyers, Dion Pondokar, said that it was right that the police had named the two commissioners suspects, claiming it was clear that they had defamed his client. "It's obvious that there was a legal violation, right from the very beginning. This is a lesson: If you insist on airing your opinions in public, be careful — don't smear someone's good name," he said.

Eurozone leaders told near-bankrupt Greece at an emergency summit on Sunday that it must restore trust by enacting key reforms before they will open talks on a new financial rescue to keep it in the European currency area.

Lefteris Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras will be required to push legislation through parliament from Monday to convince his 18 partners in the monetary union to release immediate funds to avert a Greek state bankruptcy and start negotiations on a third bailout program.

Some laws will have to be passed by Wednesday and the entire package endorsed by parliament before talks can start, one minister said.

Tsipras said on arrival in Brussels he wanted "another honest compromise" to keep Europe united. "We can reach an agreement tonight if all parties want it," he said.

A long queue of vehicles has already been seen on the West Java Cikopo-Palimanan (Cipali) toll road five days prior to Idul Fitri, as Muslims begin their homecoming travels to celebrate the day that marks the end of Ramadan.

The queue of vehicles on the toll road, which was recently opened by President Joko "Jokowi" Widodo, was reported to have reached up to 10 kilometers long as the Idul Fitri exodus began over the weekend.

"We pay the toll road fee just to enjoy 10 kilometers of congestion," a traveler wrote on his Twitter account as quoted by tribunesnews.com on Sunday.

National Police chief Gen. Badrodin Haiti said that the operation of the Cipali toll road would not automatically free travelers from congestion.

Cops involved in riot injuries

National Police chief Gen. Badrodin Haiti has said that the police force would take full responsibility for any injuries caused by shootings during the disruption of Idul Fitri prayers last Thursday in Tolikara, Papua. A riot broke out between Muslims and Christians that led to the destruction of several kiosks and left one life lost and several more injured. The general also disclosed that the police had not yet named any suspects in the incident.

"The National Police will take responsibility [for the shootings]," Badrodin told reporters on Tuesday.

Badrodin explained that the police were forced to take dramatic action after some people, thought to be members of the Evangelical Church of Indonesia (GIDI), started throwing rocks at those performing Idul Fitri prayers at the sub-district military command (Koramil) field. Tensions quickly escalated into a riot, and the police tried to subdue the angered masses with an initial warning shot, but those who instigated the riot were relentless, Badrodin said.

"Shooting is not a problem as long as it follows the procedure. It was done as part of the police's efforts to enforce the constitution, which guar-

The National Police announced on Tuesday that the number of traffic accidents during this year's Idul Fitri exodus was lower than that seen last year. The police have attributed the improvement to the performance of traffic police personnel and travelers' increased awareness of traffic safety.

The National Police's Traffic Police chief Insp. Gen. Condro Kirono said that there had been 2,148 traffic accidents since the Idul Fitri exodus started last Monday.

"This means that the number of accidents has decreased by 6 percent from last year's figure of 2,276 incidents," Condro said in a written statement.

Condro also said that the number of deaths due to traffic accidents had decreased from 503 fatalities last year to 440 this year.

"The number of lives lost has gone down by 63 people, or a total of 13 percent," he said.

Condro noted that motorcycles remained the most accident-prone vehicle, with 2,505 involved in mishaps, while 252 four-wheeled vehicles were involved in traffic ac-

Inflation skips pattern as weak consumption

Consumer prices may not greatly rise in July despite the Ramadan-Fitr festival, as consumers back spending amid economic slowdown, pollsters forecast.

One-month inflation, an at price levels in the economy in the range of 0.6 to 0.7 percent in July, Bank Indonesia Governor Agus Martowardojo said at the State Palace today, quoting the central bank survey.

The figure is lower than the average for the month of Ramadan-Fitr, when Indonesia usually boost spending for the festival and the long holiday. July Fitr in July last year, month inflation accelerated 0.3 percent, driven mostly by food prices.

As recent developments point to sluggish economic activity, analysts say that the economic downturn in Indonesia may continue, the economy having slowed to 4.7 percent in the first quarter, a level unseen since 2009.

Rangga Cipta, an economist from Samuel Sekuritas, said Wednesday that Indonesia's ongoing economic slowdown might depress purchasing power and ultimately push down core inflation.

He explained that the declining purchasing power and flat consumption were reflected in the downward trajectory of national income growth, with the economy affected by the weak output and low commodity prices.

In the second quarter, Indonesia's economic growth could decelerate further to 4.3 percent, according to a research team at Nomura Holdings, citing underperformance in several key economic indicators including cement and automotive sales.

"The slowdown cannot be ascribed solely to global woes, Indonesia's very own, once-mighty consumers continue to pull back, judging from lackluster vehicle sales and retail survey results," noted OCBK Bank economist Wellian Wiranto.

Muslims, Christians reach peace in Papua

THE JAKARTA POST/JAYAPURA/JAKARTA

Muslim and Christian communities in Tolikara, Papua, reached a peace agreement on Wednesday following last week's riot in which angered masses burned down several kiosks and the fire spread to a mosque (small mosque).

Taking place at the Karabaga Military Command (Koramil) in Tolikara, leaders from the two communities shook hands in the traditional pegunungan tengah way, in which the middle finger of a person is squeezed by the middle and forefinger of the other person and then tapped to create a sound.

After shaking hands, they hugged each other as residents from the Muslim and Christian communities witnessed the truce agreement. The settlement was preceded by community work to clean up debris from last Friday's fire.

The Muslim party was represented by Muslim preacher Ali Muchtar, while the Christian party was represented by Marthen Jingga and Noyus Wenda.

"Peace has been reached this morning at the Koramil office, where they (Muslim and Christian leaders) shook hands and hugged each other. The situation was calm and economic activity has returned to normal. The event took place for only two hours," said Tolikara Regent Usman Wanimbo in Jayapura after visiting victims receiving treatment at the Dok II regional hospital on Wednesday.

During the reconciliation, Ali Muchtar appealed to other Muslims to refrain from making provocative statements.

"Muslims in Java and Sumatra and other places should not take to revenge because positive measures have been taken as an alternative," said Ali.

Separately, six victims who were shot during the Tolikara incident in July are presently receiving treatment at the Dok II regional hospital in Jayapura. Three of them, identified as Yerenas Wanimbo, 28, Karantus Kogaya, 30, and Yulianus Lamba, 28, who were all hit in the thigh, have undergone surgery.

Three others, Ernaninus Jilwa, 21, Galibali Jilwa, 50, and Amatus Wenda, 31, will undergo surgery on Thursday.

Yerenias said that the bullets that hit them had likely ricocheted off other objects. "The bullets may have ricocheted and then hit the victims," said Yerenias.

The six victims claimed that they were not involved with the group that set fire to the stalls, which in turn then spread to the mosholla, but rather that they were only bystanders who were watching the incident from the sidewalk. Galibali, who is hearing impaired, was standing on the sidewalk when he was hit by a bullet. The bullet lodged in his thigh and it came out by itself when he was at the hospital.

Import tariff hike applauded

THE JAKARTA POST/JAKARTA

Business groups have cheered import duty rises on a wide range of manufactured goods that became effective on Thursday, expressing hope of a boost to domestic industry amid the current economic slowdown.

Indonesian Textile Association (ATI) chairman Ade Sutrisna said that the tariff increases would be beneficial to the domestic manufacturing industry, allowing fairer competition between locally made and foreign goods.

This may help push up sales of » import duties raised 30% on most industrial goods to synchronize tariffs, » tax on imported alcohol soars to 150%

» industry players express delight at regulation exceptions for special products, such as alcoholic drinks, which will see hikes of up to 150 percent.

The arrangement is part of attempts to harmonize tariffs by imposing higher duties on finished products and lower duties on raw materials and intermediate goods.

In the textile industry, significant production costs caused by higher first quarter, the lowest rate in nearly six years.

The textile industry trimmed production by 20 percent in the first quarter of this year and maintained low output through the second quarter, decreasing factory utilization.

Indonesian Food and Beverage Association (GAPMMI) chairman Adhi S. Lukman expressed a similarly positive response to the duty rises, describing the measure as "one step forward" to revise the in-harmonious tariff system. It could also provide leverage to the local food and beverage industry by pushing up sales and encouraging production, thereby lowering costs, the year after disappointing growth in the first half.

Textiles, food and beverages are among hundreds of products that will be charged higher import duties. Textile products, including T-shirts, used clothes and cozzies, will be levied between 22.5 and 25 percent, while food and beverage products, such as processed meat, candy and cookies, will be charged up to 30 percent. Alcoholic drinks will be imposed with duties up to 150 percent.

At present, Southeast Asia's economy places modest duties on foreign goods at an average of 6.8 percent, lower than other emerging economies such as China (9.4 percent), competitiveness index of 4.38 percent is below countries applying higher import tariffs, such as China (8.9 percent).

The tariff hikes comply with the rules of the World Trade Organization (WTO) and will not affect trading partners that have inked free trade agreements (FTA) with Indonesia, according to Giawardi Bustami, a special advisor to the trade minister.

Under its most favored nation (MFN) rule, the global trade governing body allows its members to apply import duties of up to 40 percent on a unilateral basis. Certain products, such as alcoholic drinks, have bound tariff rates up to 150

Tens of thousands of hectares (ha) of farmland across the archipelago are on the verge of harvest failure due to the prolonged dry season, hampering President Joko "Jokowi" Widodo's target of achieving self-sufficiency in national rice production within three years.

In Banyumas, Central Java, at least 3,000 ha of paddy fields are facing harvest failure due to drought in the regency over the past two months.

Banyumas Agriculture Agency head Tutuh Sumarti said the regen-

Forty-year-old Sartim, a local farmer from Banyumas, said he had to rent a pump for Rp 100,000 (US$7) every day for four days to irrigate his 1-hectare paddy field.

"Apart from letting the crops die, there's nothing else I could do but spend additional money," he said.

The Meteorology, Climatology and Geophysics Agency (BMKG) has recently warned that the dry season this year could last longer than that of previous years due to the weather phenomenon known as Agriculture Minister Amran Sulaiman earlier said the government had been anticipating the irregular weather patterns since early this year by building irrigation channels that spanned over 1 million ha.

He also said that the government was planning to reduce areas affected by crop failure to 10,000 ha this year from the 25,000 ha seen in previous years.

Despite continuing uncertainty in the eurozone caused by debt concerns, the market has shown a warm response to Asia's second sale of euro-denominated bonds as demonstrated by subscription during offering.

Indonesia has sold €1 (US$1.37 billion) in euro-denominated bids from investors for €2.4 billion, nearly twice the subscription, according to a report from the Finance Ministry.

The euro-denominated sale is part of the government's effort to diversify its financing sources ahead of a 10-year interest rate hike in a tenor of 10 years and a 250 basis point euro mid-swap rate.

The country's first €1 billion offering were almost seven times subscribed, helping the government garner €6.7 billion to cover a fiscal deficit at a 5.5 percent of the gross domestic product (GDP) by the end of 2015.

Finance Minister Jhonnes said that the bids, the market's first filled the government.

"They [the eurobonds] were oversubscribed and price. We also found investors were coming in Europe, the main eurobonds," he said.

European investors' absorption at a 13 percent discount and Asia (excluding Indonesia) at 13 percent, a statement, Indonesia counted for 7 percent.

PRESIDENTIAL VISIT

Obama in Kenya: 'Africa is on the move'

By Irene Superville

United States President Barack Obama heralded Africa as a continent "on the move" Saturday as he opened a US-sponsored business summit in Kenya, the East African nation where he has deep family ties.

"Africa is one of the fastest growing regions of the world," Obama said. "People are being lifted out of poverty."

Obama's visit to Kenya — the first by a US president — has been highlighted in a nation that views him as a local son. The president's late father was born in Kenya and many of his supporters still live there, including his elderly step-grandmother and his step-sister Obama.

"This is personal for me," Obama said. "This is the reason why my name is Barack Hussein Obama."

Much of the president's visit is based on boosting business and security ties with Kenya, a growing economy grappling with the threat of terrorism — most notably from the militant al-Shabab network, which has two dozen US lawmakers. Obama said he would bring 200 American investors to Kenya on his trip, which also includes stops in Ethiopia.

Obama arrived in Nairobi late Friday and spent the night reuniting with his father's family. Security was tight in the Kenyan capital, with some of the city's normally bustling streets closed to traffic and pedestrian during his visit.

Such stores were palpable emotions in Nairobi for Obama's long-awaited visit. US and Kenyan flags lined the main road from the airport and billboard featuring Obama's picture dotted the city.

Obama touted the inaugural entrepreneurship summit at the White House in 2010. This year's conference is the first to be held in sub-Saharan Africa.

Kenya President Uhuru Kenyatta, who cohosted the summit with Obama, lauded that the continent's security and other challenges, including the 2011 attack on an upscale Nairobi mall, had created a negative reputation. He said he hoped Obama's visit would help change the narrative about Kenya and Africa.

"Africa is the world's richest and most promising frontier of limitless opportunity," Kenyatta said. "None are the days when the only lens to view our continent was one of despair and indignity."

After his speech to the summit, Obama turned an innovation fair highlighting the work of vendors working with his Power Africa initiative, which aims to double sub-Saharan access to electricity. As he perused solar panels and posed for photos, Obama acknowledged concerns that the program's progress has been slow, but said it would soon help millions and that building power plants takes time — even in the US.

Executive order: President Joko Widodo points toward a tunnel while inspecting the construction of Raknamo Reservoir in Kupang regency, East Nusa Tenggara, on Saturday. Jokowi said he wanted the 147-hectare dam, expected to overcome various problems in the province such as drought, famine and malnutrition, to be completed in three years instead of the previously planned five years.

Ri on a mission to stave off drought, food crisis

Djenni Anniflu

THE JAKARTA POST/WIPAKANG

President Joko "Jokowi" Widodo pledged on Saturday to complete the Raknamo reservoir project in Kupang regency, East Nusa Tenggara (NTT), in three years, instead of the previously planned five.

The speeding-up of the project is part of the government's efforts to help the country's drought-prone regions improve their agriculture sector and avoid a food crisis.

In a visit to the dam project site in Raknamo sub-district, Amabi Odoto district, President Jokowi said he was keen to see the dam completed by the end of 2017.

"I came back to see the progress of the dam development, seven months after I opened the project. I have been promised that [the dam] will be completed within three years instead of the planned five years. By the end of 2017, it will be completed and in operation," he said.

Once completed, the Raknamo dam, with construction costs of Rp 760 billion (US$524 million), is expected to provide irrigation for at least 1,250 hectares of farmland in Kupang regency and the neighboring Kupang municipality, the province's capital.

The dam, which will have a capacity of 14.09 million cubic meters, will also serve as a major source of clean water for local residents. It has also been designed for use as a mini hydro-power plant.

During Saturday's visit, Jokowi, who was accompanied by several ministers, including State-Owned Enterprises Minister Rini Soemarno, Agrarian and Spatial Planning Minister Ferry Muryawan Balkan, and Agriculture Minister Amran Sulaiman, did not give lengthy speeches, and instead spent most of his one-hour visit inspecting the progress of the dam's construction.

"I will monitor [the project] and return [here] again so that the dam can be completed as soon as possible," he said.

Jokowi, who was inaugurated as the country's seventh president in October last year, has pledged to lead the country to become self-sufficient in rice production within three years.

However, many regions in the country have reported that large amounts of farmland are on the verge of harvest failure as a result of this year's prolonged dry season, which has been triggered by the weather phenomenon known as El Niño.

The Meteorology, Climatology and Geophysics Agency (BMKG) predicts that the El Niño effect will extend Indonesia's dry season, which normally takes place between April and September, until November and affect 18 provinces, including North Sumatra, West Java, Central Java, East Java and NTT.

Thousands of residents of NTT's South Timor, Tengah regency, for example, have reportedly been suffering from a food crisis since earlier this year following poor harvests. Some of the residents have even been forced to consume jute, a palmira palm tree-based dish, to survive.

Earlier this week, Minister Anniflu said the government had been anticipating the irregular weather patterns since early this year by building irrigation channels that spanned over 1 million ha. He also said that the government was planning to reduce areas affected by crop failure to 10,000 ha this year from the 25,000 ha seen in previous years.

Speaking to The Jakarta Post on the sideline of President Jokowi's visit on Saturday, Public Works and Public Housing Minister Basuki Hadimuljono, said the government was planning to build seven new dams in NTT within the next five years to help provide sufficient irrigation for the province's farmland.

Apart from the Tilong dam, currently the only reservoir in the province, NTT has 800 retention basins. However, they are not enough to provide irrigation for all farmland in the province over a whole year, according to Basuki.

"West Nusa Tenggara province, for example, has a more advanced agriculture sector than NTT as it now has 10 reservoirs," he said, adding that the government had allocated Rp 5.6 trillion from the state budget for the establishment of the seven new dams in NTT.

To speed up the completion of the Raknamo dam, Basuki said the development project was being worked on 24 hours a day, with workers split into day and night shifts.

Local community leader Anselmus Dago said he applauded the government's efforts to help NTT end its long-standing water crisis.

"Drought in NTT is an annual routine. The new dam will become an oasis in the middle of a desert," he said.

PDI-P off to sure start as poll process begins

With December's regional elections approaching fast, the first day of registration for candidates nominated by political parties opened on Sunday. The country's largest party, the Indonesian Democratic Party of Struggle (PDI-P), confidently proposed its nominees on single-party tickets, rather than as part of coalitions.

Running again: The Indonesian Democratic Party of Struggle's (PDI-P) respective candidates for Surabaya mayor and deputy mayor, Tri Rismaharini and Winan Sidiq Bina, travel on a motorcycle to the General Elections Commission's (KPU) office in Surabaya to file their nomination papers on Sunday. The pair, both incumbents, will stand for re-election in December.

"I hope other parties will nominate their candidates," the popular former Jakarta (then-schooled politician) said yesterday after the registration. The election will be postponed until next year if only one party registers.

In the country's second city, the PDI-P has 28 of the 50 seats on the legislative council. Six other political parties, namely Golkar, the Democratic Party, Gerindra, the Prosperous Justice Party (PKS), the National Awakening Party (PKB) and the National Mandate Party (PAN), which earlier formed a coalition, have not yet submitted any candidate names.

Meanwhile in Surabaya, a stronghold of the PDI-P, the party's registered incumbent Mayor FX Hadi Rudyatno and Deputy Mayor Rachmad Purmono are candidates on Sunday.

Ready as the mayor is known, was announced from deputy mayor to replace Joko "Jokowi" Widodo when the latter was elected as Jakarta governor in 2012. Jokowi became President last year.

While the PDI-P confidently registered candidates in Java, outside the island, the party which is chaired by former president Megawati Soedikarnah, seemed less sure of itself. In Gowa regency, South Sulawesi, candidate pair Andi Makkasala and Ili and Wahyuni Purmana, who were mentioned by the Democratic PKS and Hanura, registered in the local KPU.

In Selangor regency in the same province, the duo of Basri Ali and Rosmedien, who were mentioned by PKS and Hanura, also submitted their names on Sunday.

However, KPU offices in nine regencies and cities in South Sulawesi, namely Maros, Pangajene, Wajo, Tana Toraja, North Toraja, and Bulukumba, received no registrations.

After, the duo stepped in

The government should be very strict in making sure that PT Freeport Indonesia abides by all regulations before it decides to give its final approval to extend the firm's export permit, or it would lead to big trouble in the future, legislators warned the government on Sunday.

"The government must be strict. It has to thoroughly assess the progress of Freeport Indonesia's smaller development based on requirements that have been regulated. This is about the country's dignity and so we have to be firm with Freeport," said Dito Gatotadito, a member of the House of Representatives Commission VII overseeing energy.

Last week, when the working days were interrupted by a long holiday for Idul Fitri, the company held a series of meetings with the Energy and Mineral Resources Ministry and the ministry's directorate general of mineral and coal.

The move was aimed at securing

- » Extended export permit is against the law
- » Freeport expects new permit will be issued
- » Papuans have never been involved by Freeport an extension for a permit to export copper concentrate that expired on Saturday.

The permit had granted Freeport Indonesia a six-month extension to continue exporting semi-finished product in the form of copper concentrate following the implementation of an export ban on raw minerals.

The government still plans to halt the permit, but Freeport Indonesia will continue to seek an extension for the sake of production continuity.

"We are firm with other companies and so we have to be firm with Freeport," Dito pointed out.

Taking a harsher stance, Commission VII head Kardaya Warningsa reiterated that giving out the export permit was actually against the 2009 Mining Law.

"Under the law, there should have been no more exports of concentrate. If the permit is issued, it means that the issuer of the permit violates the law," he said.

As part of the implementation of the mining law, the government started the ban on mineral ore exports early last year. However, following cries from industry players, then president Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono issued regulations to relax the ban policy.

Under the regulations, mining firms are allowed to continue exporting semi-finished mineral products, such as concentrate, until 2017 as long as they are committed to establishing downstream facilities.

"Regulations that are against the law are invalid. If the government wants to do something that is against the law, it has to change the law first. I don't push for a revision of the law, but an issuance of Perppu [government regulations in lieu of law], but now there is no legal certainty for investors," Kardaya said.

Separately, Energy and Mineral Resources Minister Sudirman Said insisted on not giving an extension of the export permit to the copper giant. The company submitted its request for an extension in late June.

"We are still waiting for Freeport Indonesia to fulfill its commitment for another development. There is as much as US$80 million the company still has not disbursed," Sudirman said late last week.

Freeport Indonesia spokesman Risa Pratama said that the company was still in discussions with the government in regard to the export permit.

"We are expecting that the permit will be issued in the near future," he said over the weekend.

Meanwhile, Hans Kaiwal, a lecturer at Cenderawasih University's school of economics, said the company never involved Papuans as the main stakeholders in making policy decisions and only negotiated with the central government.

"The Papuans wanted to be directly involved in all negotiations from the very beginning because we are the owners of the mining seat," the economist told the Post.

Company profits take a battering

Company profits have taken a significant hit due to a combination of factors, including a decline in demand and increased competition. The economic downturn has led to a sharp decline in sales, while new entrants in the market have put pressure on established companies. Additionally, rising costs of raw materials and labor have further eroded profit margins. Many companies are now facing a difficult financial situation and are looking for ways to cut costs and improve efficiency. The government has expressed concern over the state of the economy and has implemented various measures to support businesses and stimulate growth. However, the impact of the economic challenges remains significant, and companies will need to navigate these difficult times carefully.
